at nunc, inter se quia nexus principiorum dissimiles constant aeternaque materies est, incolumi remanent res corpore, dum satis acris vis obeat pro textura cuiusque reperta. haud igitur redit ad nihilum res ulla, sed omnes discidio redeunt in corpora materiai.

Ma ora, poiché connessioni dissimili stringono tra loro i principi, e la materia è eterna, le cose conservano incolume il corpo, finché non si presenti una forza che sia abbastanza gagliarda in proporzione alla tessitura di ciascuna.

Non ritorna dunque al nulla alcuna cosa, ma tutte per disgregazione ritornano agli elementi della materia.

But now, because the fastenings of primordial parts Are put together diversely and matter is everlasting, Things abide the same unhurt and sure, until some power Comes on strong to destroy the warp and woof of each. Nothing returns to naught; but all Return at their collapse to primal forms of matter.

- Lucretius, De Rerum Natura [On the Nature of Things], 1.244-249

ON THE (INTERCONNECTED) NATURE OF THINGS: OBSERVING AS REINTERPRETING, EXPERIENCING AS REMINISCING

When something appears too obvious, art compels us to look harder, to reconsider it. What follows, usually, is a process of discovery. This adagio is at the very heart of Francesca Pasquali's practice. Her research across the biological and artificial realms stems from a fascination with the ways of nature, where scientific processes, tangible matter, and visual qualities are inextricably connected. In nature, the artist finds a repository of structural and visual permutations whose endless declinations constitute all we know and can conceive.

Inspiration often emerges, to echo Pasquali's words, when she is not paying attention to what surrounds her. Inquisitiveness moves her when she is not seeking. The initial step of her creative process lies in a scientific analysis of encountered organic elements: a quest for the secret structures, materials, textures, colors, and ever-changing shapes of the biological realm. This close observation leads her to discern the inherent resonances between the products of nature and those of technology – that is, the manmade. Through this process, Pasquali develops artworks that shed light on such reverberations: the forms of nature mutate into their artificial counterparts in an exercise of experimentation and interpretation.

The microscopic structure of a fly's eye, or the crystals of salt in an iceberg, find their structural and functional analogies in the artist's Straws series, where compositions of plastic straws are presented in dynamic forms that echo their organic equivalents while physically reaching out to the viewer. In another instance, cocoons of polyurethane foam flutter through the Bozzoli series, while testing the work's ability to embody different scales, structures, and kinds of public interaction. The Frappa series taking its name from crisply indented Italian pastry sweets - uses sinuosity as a way to survey bread, marble, and neoprene, once again creating a game of references across the natural and the manufactured that involves all senses: the aroma of the dough, the visual perfection of marble, the sinuosity of the rubber that Pasquali invites us to touch. Some of this series' iterations even feature mirrors, so as to secure the viewer's visual presence in the artwork while accentuating its curvy maze.

Pasquali winks at us, but that is not all. The mutations she enacts are not a simplistic aesthetic exercise where natural shapes are imitated through manmade materials; rather, her practice deconstructs artificial objects of mass-scale consumption and utilizes them as conceptual lens through which 21st century observers can reinterpret nature. By weaving a net of intellectual, visual, and material references between the biological and the synthetic, the artist asks the viewer to take advantage of their familiarity with the latter to reinterpret the former - to reminisce about something inherent to our human nature that was forgotten in the technological process, but that we inevitably seem to replicate when conceiving our manmade inventions.

In her game of micro and macroscopic vision, the artist plays with different scales and values: utilitarian and aesthetic, conceptual and material, scientific and artistic. Her artworks are occurrences in which cognitive and physical responsiveness meet instinctive memory and aesthetic experience, thanks to materials originally intended for mere use, consumption, and discarding. The consumerist thus escapes this fate in the artist's transformative process and becomes a vehicle of production of knowledge.

Pasquali operates across and around the confines and expectations associated with art-making and the public experience. She acts upon ideas of creation and use, innate and mediated, art and design, and explores the ability of her research to adapt, to fluidly embody new shapes as they change contexts and substances. The artist restrains from mediating the experience of the work for the public – this is why her titles identify creative frameworks but are never descriptive. They point towards the conceptual direction in which the artist is interested in challenging the viewer, as if bringing us to a foreign terrain in which we have the independence to construct our own points of reference and understanding.

Her work, therefore, is not meant to function independently of its audiences. Its context and the gazes it encounters are central to the process. The artist activates us by asking to look, touch, interrogate, and reminisce. Her work is never confined to bidimensionality. By trespassing the boundaries of the sculptural, it expands into the environmental and the temporal, reaching at times the field of immersive installations featuring sound and video. Matter thus becomes space, and space reacts to matter. The relationship is inextricable, and the viewer is the one galvanizing it.

However, Pasquali's practice points to more than the dualism of nature and artifice. Her research is not self-referential: it works around key aspects of modern and contemporary creative experimentation. It interrogates the grounds of artistic monochrome and abstraction in the era of consumption and tests the possibilities of spatial and bodily engagement, trespassing into architectural construction. Her series investigate public interactions and their multiple interpretations through a performative and engaging nature. Ultimately, if 20th century artistic research led to the use of common materials, from Alberto Burri's Celotex fiberboard to Arte Povera's protean strategies, Pasquali pushes further the question of which readily available materials, perhaps rich in conceptual potential but with commonly unsophisticated social status, can be incorporated into the aura of art-making.
